For your highest priority issue, why is it your highest and how would you address it?

Brian Jones (R)

Our children and grandchildren are our highest priority. Their access and success in a quality education system will affect every facet of their future, whether it be career options, housing security and raising their own kids one day. At the top of a successful education system must be active involvement by parents in their children's education. Democrat politicians at all levels of government are trying to restrict, limit and block parents from being involved in their kids' education and I will always side with parents in this fight.

A woman's right to an abortion is a settled issue in California. In fact, the voters themselves will have a chance to cement this right in the state Constitution through Proposition 1 on the November ballot. Democrat politicians know this but are still stirring up fears about abortion rights to distract from their poor record on inflation, crime, homelessness, and parental rights in the public education system.

Joseph Rocha (D)

We need common sense solutions to ensure every family can make their rent and mortgage payments. I will focus on resources that help families remain in their homes, ending discrimination in the housing process, expanding access to first-time homebuyer loans, and investing in smarter community development.

I believe all of these issues are interconnected. However, Immigration policy is mostly determined at the federal level. I will continue to call for the federal government to make fair, humane, and equitable reforms to our immigration process, and for California to welcome immigrants as valuable members of our society.
